DEADLY 'TORPEDOPLANE' MAY SEES NO HOPE MAKE WARSHIPS WORTHLESS

Big Navies Experiment with New Type of "Submarine Automobile" Gunfire.

By FREDERIC WILLIAM WILE.

The "torpedoplane" may solve the problem of costly naval armaments before international statesmen agree about them. Every great navy in the world today, I learn, is conducting secret and extensive experiments with aircraft capable of launching "submarine automobile torpedoes." If such airplanes can be perfected, it is the consensus of opinion among naval experts that the great surface men-of-war, like battleships and battle-cruisers, are doomed

The British navy has halted its projected new building program not, as erroneously conjectured, to await the outcome of 'naval holiday" discussions, but to see whether the "torpedoplane" will not obviate the laying down of another single warship of the

A famous allied air expert who accomplished specific results with a "torpedoplane" now is stationed in Washington, Capt. Alessandro Guidoni, air attache of the Italian Embassy. Guidoni in experimental work launched "submarine automobile torpedoes" from an airplane so accurately that a target was hit at 3,000 yards

The "torpedoplane" is transported on a ship and makes its ascent from the deck. The torpedo is slung alongside or under the "car' of the airplane and released by a lever. Practical experiments have been carried out in Europe with an airplane that had a "spread" of 52 feet and which weighed, including weight of the torpedo and fuel, 5,720 pounds The machine had a radius of five hours. The time needed for descending to a launching position is so short that even vessels actually on guard may be successfully attacked. The torpedo enters the water at a speed about equal to that of an airplane and greater than that which ordinarily belongs to it, thus creating entirely new launching conditions. Another advantage is that it follows a horizontal course through which it is constantly offensive. It thus is the only weapon which directly attacks the hull of a
